With a monster winter storm taking aim at a third of the nation Monday, threatening to lay a potentially deadly path of heavy snow and ice from the Rockies to New England, weather trackers here have reported that January has entered the books as the snowiest month ever.

Bradley International Airport in Windsor Locks, Conn., reported 34 inches fell in January and more snow is on the way for the beginning of the new month.

Cities including St. Louis, Kansas City and Milwaukee could be hardest hit by this week's storms, with expected midweek snowfalls of up to 2 feet and drifts piled 5 to 10 feet.

After burying the Midwest, the storm was expected to sweep into the Northeast today and Wednesday.

According to ABC's Fox 6 meteorologist Mike Messer, the area will get back-to-back storms, with the first one bringing 3 to 6 inches in Western Massachusetts and more than a half-foot of snow over the eastern slopes of the Berkshires and areas north of the Massachusetts Turnpike.

The second storm will strike Wednesday, bringing a total of 6 to 12 inches of snow with at much as 12 inches of drifts in some areas.

Paul Cormier shovels off a roof on Thorndike Street in Palmer on Monday, getting ready for the next storm to hit the area today and Wednesday.
